Concerns about human trafficking in other parts of the country have many concerned that it could happen in this area.

An Estonian student selling a learning system to assist families with school-aged children to help finance his educational costs recently became a subject of such concern.

In his fourth summer in the U.S., Kuldar Kongo, through Southwestern Advantage based in Nashville, Tenn., runs his own business to help offset his educational expenses by selling the resources door-to-door.

Kongo and other students have become the victims of false, defaming Facebook rumors saying college students selling Southwestern Advantage's products are a front for a human trafficking ring.

"This is absolutely false," said Trey Campbell, the company's director of communications.
