Seward County has had a mail ballot, it was before my time,' clerk says

With Christmas less than a week away, mail trucks and delivery services scramble to deliver holiday purchases. But Seward County Clerk Stacia Long is contemplating a different kind of shopping: how many envelopes her office might need early next year, and how soon to order them.

If the USD 480 school board opts to present its upcoming bond issue to the public as a mail ballot, Long's office will take on the task of sending a printed ballot to every active registered voter in the county — a number that could reach around 8,000 people. It is a project unlike any she's supervised before.

"Here's the deal," she said. "It's a little tricky to make sure we have the supplies necessary; we don't want to order them today until the school board has taken final action. But we don't want to wait too long, either."

Vote's in the mail?
