Next step is teaching voters what's at stake

Monday, the USD 480 school board approved a bond election.

Now, it's time to get busy with the teaching process — not the everyday business of teaching children in the district how to read, find countries on a map or solve algebraic equations — but the task of educating voters.

“What we have to do is get the information out there,” said Superintendent of Schools Paul Larkin. “They need the facts, the details about the plan, what the changes could mean for our kids and this community.” Those who work in the district must teach the public, helping voters understand what's at stake and what is possible.

However, Larkin said, the district's role in this process is one of education, not advocacy.
