Revolution Cage Warrior Challenge's Summer Heat certainly lived up to its name Saturday night, providing plenty of excitement for those in attendance. The night started with some entertaining junior grappling matches, and ended with Liberal's own Mario Munoz celebrating a victory in the main event over Trent Wilkinson.

Without a doubt, Munoz' win and celebration afterward was the highlight of the night. With every punch that Munoz landed, the hometown crowd erupted with approval. Two minutes and 40 seconds into the third and final round, Munoz was able to make Wilkinson tap out with an arm-in guillotine submission.

"That guy (Wilkinson) was real tough," Rine said. "Normally when Mario (Munoz) hits you like that the fight is over."

The night also had its fair share of controversy. Jesus Escarsega got a win over Kunta Ford after the doctor stopped the fight due to a gash on Ford's right shoulder.

Prior to the final decision, a misunderstanding prompted a near melee between Escarsega and Ford's trainer.

“Jesus thought he was going to lose the fight,” David Rine said. “He thought he might have lost the first round, and didn’t know he was going to win. Jesus was telling the trainer, ‘You got to make your guy fight,’” Rine said. “I’m not losing the fight this way.”

Once the fighters left the cage and headed toward the locker rooms, a fan in attendance took exception to the whole situation. The unruly fan made an attempt to get at Ford’s trainer. Security was able to step in and remove the man quickly before the situation could escalate any further.

“They were able to control the situation really quick,” Rine said. “Security was on it in a heartbeat.”

Despite the brief break in the action due to the incident, the night was an all-around success.

“I was really impressed with the juniors,” Rine said. “Those kids are very technical. The fights were great. We had another sold out crowd and the competition was high level.”
