Dual-language instruction may come to an end

By David Hume

The Ontario Education Quality Improvement Board (EQIB) is considering whether to end dual-language instruction in public schools. The board is currently reviewing evidence on the effectiveness of dual-language programs and is expected to make a decision in the coming months. Dual-language instruction is a program in which students learn to read and write in two languages, typically English and a second language. The program is designed to help students become bilingual and to improve their academic achievement. The board is concerned that the program may be too costly and that it may not be as effective as other language programs. The board is also concerned that the program may be too difficult for some students to learn. The board is currently reviewing evidence on the effectiveness of dual-language programs and is expected to make a decision in the coming months.
