Lesser Prairie Chicken could restrict farming, ranching
Sweet pea flock of ornate species restricts range of Lesser Prairie Chicken

The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service is considering whether to list the Lesser Prairie Chicken as a threatened species. The bird is found in the High Plains region of the United States and is known for its ornate appearance. The Service is concerned that the bird's habitat is being lost to farming and ranching. If the bird is listed as threatened, it could restrict farming and ranching activities in the region.
