Increase in regulations cause closure of FBC daycare

By KIMBERLY HARRIS
The closure of Family Child Care Center in High Plains, Kan., is a result of increased regulations for daycare facilities. The center, which had been operating for several years, was forced to close its doors in late 2012. The closure was due to the center's inability to meet the new regulations, which were implemented by the state of Kansas. The center's owner, Kimberly Harris, expressed her disappointment and frustration over the closure, stating that she had invested a significant amount of money and time into the center. She noted that the regulations were overly strict and did not take into account the needs of small, family-run daycare centers. Harris is currently looking for other ways to provide childcare for the community.
