Traffic cones don't have a chance when it comes to impaired driving
A new study from the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration (NHTSA) shows that traffic cones are ineffective at reducing impaired driving. The study found that drivers who were impaired by alcohol were more likely to drive through traffic cones than when they were sober. The study also found that drivers who were impaired by alcohol were more likely to be involved in a crash than when they were sober. The study was conducted over a period of six months and involved 1,000 drivers. The study was funded by the NHTSA. For more information, visit the NHTSA website at www.nhtsa.gov.
