Plans for wind farm put on hold

Plans for a wind farm in the mountains of British Columbia have been put on hold. The project, which was to be a 100-turbine wind farm, has been delayed due to concerns over the impact on the local environment. The project was to be located in the mountains of British Columbia, near the town of Hazelton. The project was to be a 100-turbine wind farm, which would have generated clean energy for the region.
