When Mike Hodge, executive director of the National Endowment for the Arts, announced that he was leaving his post, it was a surprise to many. He had been in the job for 12 years, and his departure was seen as a significant loss to the arts community. Hodge's tenure was marked by a commitment to supporting the arts and ensuring that they remained a vital part of American culture. His departure has led to a search for a new executive director, a process that is expected to take several months. In the meantime, the National Endowment for the Arts continues to support various arts programs and initiatives across the country.

Kan. court remands case of gun shop liability

AP/WIDEWORLD
TOPEKA, Kan. (AP) — A Kansas federal court has remanded a case involving a gun shop's liability for a shooting. The case, which was filed in federal court in Topeka, involves a lawsuit filed by a family whose son was killed in a shooting at a gun shop. The lawsuit alleges that the gun shop was negligent in the way it handled the sale of the gun. The court's decision to remand the case means that it will be sent back to state court for further proceedings. This decision is seen as a victory for the gun shop, as it may limit the potential liability for such incidents.

Obama's remarks on race resonate with many

AP/WIDEWORLD

President Barack Obama's remarks on race during his State of the Union address have resonated with many Americans. In his address, Obama spoke about the challenges of race in America and the need for a more unified and inclusive society. His words were seen as a powerful call to action, and many people have expressed their appreciation for his leadership on this issue. Obama's remarks have also sparked a national conversation about race and the role of government in addressing these issues. This conversation is expected to continue for some time, as Americans grapple with the complex and often divisive issues of race and social justice.
