How much will mandates cost local taxpayers?
By Jeffery M. Hertzberg
The Obama administration's new health care law, the Affordable Care Act, will require many states to pay for the cost of providing health care to low-income residents who do not have private health insurance. This is a significant new responsibility for many states, and it is likely to lead to a significant increase in state spending. The amount of the increase will depend on the state's population and the number of low-income residents who do not have private health insurance. In Kansas, the amount of the increase is expected to be around $1 billion per year.
