SUICIDE WATCH
A new study published in the journal of the American Psychiatric Association suggests that people who are suicidal are more likely to be helped by family members than by mental health professionals. The study found that family members were more likely to provide emotional support and practical help than mental health professionals. The researchers also found that family members were more likely to be trusted by their loved ones than mental health professionals. This suggests that family members may be better equipped to help their loved ones who are suicidal. USA MENTAL HEALTH FIRST AID

DUST BOWL
New book looks at those who survived and stayed
By David Shields
The Dust Bowl was a time of great hardship for many Americans. But for some, it was a time of survival and even triumph. A new book, "The Dust Bowl: How One Man Survived the Worst Year in American History," tells the story of a man who stayed in his home during the worst of the drought and how he managed to survive. The author, David Shields, spent years researching the story and interviewing people who lived through the experience. The book is a powerful and moving account of a man's resilience and determination. Farmer's Daughter

Local man's effort helping restore abandoned Springfield Cemetery
A local man is working to restore an abandoned cemetery in Springfield, Missouri. The cemetery, which was abandoned in the 1950s, is now overgrown and in poor condition. The man, who is a volunteer, is working to clear the area and restore the graves. He has already cleared several graves and is working on others. The cemetery is a historic site and is an important part of the city's heritage. The man's efforts are being praised by the community and the city. Missouri man charged with extortion in 4-city water threat
A Missouri man has been charged with extortion after threatening to cut off water to four cities. The man, who is a former police officer, threatened to cut off water to Springfield, Branson, and two other cities. The threat was made over the radio and on social media. The man was charged with extortion and is being held in custody. The cities are working to ensure that their water supply is not cut off. The man's actions are being condemned by the community and the state.
