Lawrence County is looking to spend $100,000 to stop concealed carry in two buildings, according to a report from the county commission. The commission is considering a request for a four-year exemption from the state's concealed carry law, which would allow the county to spend the money on security measures in the buildings. The exemption would expire in 2017. The commission is expected to vote on the request on Monday, Dec. 16.
