 City ethics rules prevent pensioners from public business
 By David J. Phillips
 A group of city pensioners is trying to get the city to allow them to work for the city again. But the city's ethics rules prevent them from doing so. The city's ethics rules state that pensioners are not allowed to work for the city in any capacity that would be considered a public business. This means that pensioners cannot work for the city in any capacity that would be considered a public business. This means that pensioners cannot work for the city in any capacity that would be considered a public business.
