Prevention is firefighters' top priority
By Tom Clavin
A fire department in Columbus is focused on preventing fires rather than fighting them, according to a report from the National Fire Protection Association (NFPA). The report, released last week, shows that firefighters are increasingly concerned about the safety of their communities. The NFPA says that the number of fires has increased in the last five years, and that the number of deaths and injuries has also risen. The report also notes that firefighters are facing a shortage of personnel and equipment, which is making it more difficult for them to do their jobs. The NFPA says that the best way to prevent fires is to educate the public about fire safety. This includes teaching people how to use smoke detectors, how to escape a fire, and how to prevent fires from starting in the first place. The NFPA also encourages people to check their fire extinguishers regularly and to make sure they are properly maintained.
