Water: Lifeblood of the High Plains
The High Plains region of the United States is one of the most important agricultural areas in the world. The region's water supply is primarily from the Ogallala Aquifer, a vast underground water source that stretches across eight states. The aquifer is being depleted at an alarming rate, and scientists predict that it could run dry within a few decades. This has led to a growing awareness of the need to conserve water and find alternative sources of water for the region.

Scrap dealer's bargain turns out to be Faberge egg
A scrap dealer's bargain turned out to be a Faberge egg, a highly valuable collectible. The dealer had purchased the egg for a few dollars, but it was later discovered to be a genuine Faberge egg, worth thousands of dollars. The dealer had been told that it was a fake, but it turned out to be the real thing. The dealer is now enjoying a large profit on the sale.

Voters must live in city limits to participate in sales tax question
The Kansas State Board of Education has ruled that voters must live in city limits to participate in a sales tax question. The board's decision was based on a technicality in the state constitution, which requires that voters be residents of the city in which they are voting. This means that voters who live in unincorporated areas or in cities that have not annexed the area cannot vote on the question.

Kansas, Arizona prevail in voter citizenship suit
The Kansas Supreme Court has ruled in favor of Kansas and Arizona in a lawsuit challenging the Arizona citizenship question on the ballot. The court ruled that the Arizona question was unconstitutional because it required voters to be citizens of the United States, not just Arizona. This decision is a significant victory for Kansas and Arizona, as it means that the Arizona question will not be on the ballot.

Kansas Law Enforcement Training Center announces December graduates
The Kansas Law Enforcement Training Center has announced the graduates of its December training program. The graduates will be sworn in as police officers in various law enforcement agencies across the state. The training program is one of the most rigorous in the country, and the graduates are well-prepared to serve the public.
