LEADERSHIP

It's a dilemma that's tearing at the heart of many communities across the state: How do you protect your people and your pets? In Lawrence, Kan., the answer is a matter of life and death. The city is facing a crisis as it prepares for the possibility of a major tornado. The city's emergency management director, Kimble, says that the city's current plan is to build shelters for people, but not for pets. This is a problem because many pet owners are unwilling to leave their animals behind. Kimble says that the city is currently in discussions with pet owners about the possibility of building pet shelters. However, this is a costly and time-consuming process. Two men have dropped their federal lawsuit challenging the state's voter ID law. The lawsuit was filed in federal court in Kansas City, Mo. The two men, who are both attorneys, had argued that the law violated the state constitution. However, they have now agreed to a settlement with the state. The settlement requires the state to pay the two men's legal fees. The state's attorney general, Karyn Pryor, says that the settlement is a victory for the state. Pryor says that the state's voter ID law is a necessary measure to protect the integrity of the state's elections. She says that the law is based on the state constitution and is not unconstitutional.
