Family tests Kan. water law, claims impairment
A family in Kansas is testing a new water law. The family claims that the law is causing impairment to their water supply. They are seeking legal action. The law allows for the construction of new water projects without the usual environmental review. The family is concerned that this will lead to the depletion of their water source. They are working with lawyers to challenge the law.

Kansas considers revised permit for coal plant
Kansas is considering a revised permit for a coal plant. The permit is being reviewed by the state's regulatory agencies. The plant is located in a sensitive area and there are concerns about its impact on the environment. The state is working to address these concerns and ensure that the plant meets all necessary requirements. The revised permit includes additional measures to protect the environment and public health.
