Feds mum on Kansas prairie chicken law
 The federal government has remained silent on a new law regarding the prairie chicken in Kansas. The law, which was passed by the state legislature, aims to protect the prairie chicken, a species that is facing extinction. The federal government's silence has led to speculation about whether the law will be enforced or if it will be challenged in court.

Energy savings bill fails amid election politics
 A bill aimed at promoting energy savings has failed to pass in the legislature due to election politics. The bill, which would have provided incentives for energy-efficient home improvements, was blocked by opposition from both sides of the aisle. The focus on election politics has overshadowed the bill's potential benefits for the state's energy sector.
