National campaign includes selfies

By David J. ...
A national campaign to raise awareness about the dangers of drug use is using a new tactic: selfies. The campaign, called "Don't Do It," is a joint effort by the National Drug Control Administration and the National Institute on Drug Abuse. The campaign encourages people to take a selfie with a sign that says "Don't Do It" and post it on social media. The campaign is aimed at young people, who are most at risk of drug use. The campaign is also being used to raise money for drug treatment programs.

Kansas girl takes the wheel in emergency

By David J. ...
A young girl in Lawrence, Kansas, took the wheel of a car in an emergency situation on May 14, 2014. The girl, who is 11 years old, was driving the car when her mother fell asleep at the wheel. The car was on the road for about 10 minutes before the mother woke up and took control of the car. The incident occurred on a busy highway. The girl was not injured, and the car was not damaged. The incident has raised questions about the legal liability of parents who allow their children to drive a car.
