Food safety aim of ServSafe program

By Robert Noyce
SERVSAFE

Food safety is a top priority for many businesses, and the ServSafe program is a leading way to ensure that food service workers are properly trained and certified. The program, which is a requirement for many food service establishments, provides a comprehensive curriculum that covers food safety, sanitation, and food allergen awareness. The program is designed to help food service workers understand the importance of food safety and how to prevent foodborne illness. The program is available in both English and Spanish, and is offered in a variety of formats, including classroom, online, and self-paced. The program is recognized by the National Health and Medical Research Council (NHMRC) and the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA). The program is also recognized by the American Society of Public Health (ASPH) and the National Restaurant Association (NRA). The program is a requirement for many food service establishments, and is a key component of the ServSafe certification process. The program is available for free to members of the National Health and Medical Research Council (NHMRC) and the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA).
